For defendant Kenneth James.

ORDER

GÓMEZ, J.

Before the Court is the motion of Kenneth James ("James") to disqualify the undersigned.

James argues that the undersigned must be removed from this case because the undersigned has exceeded ten years as a judge on the District Court of the Virgin Islands. James argues that the current case cannot proceed until a new judge is appointed to oversee the proceedings.

The Revised Organic Act, in pertinent part, provides that the term of appointment for a judge of the District Court of the Virgin Islands is "ten years and until their successors are chosen and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President for cause." 48 U.S.C. § 1614(a) (emphasis added). Given that context, the remedy suggested by James is only possible if one were to ignore the conjunctive language "and until," that immediately follows the words "ten years."

Of course, the Court is required to give meaning to each word in a statute and to read the statute as a whole. Tavarez v. Klingensmith, 372 F.3d 188, 190 (3d Cir. 2004). It would be verboten to do otherwise in interpreting a statute. Applying well-established principles of statutory construction to the Revised Organic Act, the statutory language is very clear. The ten-year period referred to in the Revised Organic Act is a floor for a district judge's term. It is not a cap. See 18 U.S.C. § 1614(a). In short, the term is not finite. Indeed, only if a successor is chosen and qualified does the term end.<sup>1</sup> 48 U.S.C. § 1614(a).

<sup>1</sup> Clearly, Congress has the capacity to legislate terms of office for a finite period, as it has in other contexts. See, e.g., 26 U.S.C. § 7443(e) ("The term of office of any judge of the Tax Court shall expire 15 years after he takes office."). Exercising its sound discretion, Congress chose not to define a finite term with respect to judges of the District Court of the Virgin Islands.

The premises considered; it is hereby

ORDERED that James's motion to disqualify docketed at ECF
Number 46 is DENIED.
